Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Glimpse of Prison Life (From the San Francisco Daily News June 5, 1909.)If you chance to meet J. Wess Moore, you wont have any trouble in identifying him. He looks more like Uncle Sam than any one you know, with the shrewd, kindly features familiar to the caricature and inevitable chin beard. He will offer you, if you seem approachable, a pamphlet of verse entitled, Glimpses of Prison Life. Its price is whatever you are inclined to give, but whatever that may be, it will be well applied. Echoes were written before Moore was admitted to parole. Every one of them was suggested by some experience of his eight years in stripes, part of his life sentence for killing the man who had jumped his claim. The verse form is simple, often crude, but the thoughts, are not, for they are thoughts that would not down. Moore did not begin life either as a poet or philosopher. He was a farmer boy in the old Quaker town of Dublin, Indiana. Where barely 15 years of...
