It was while he was bewildered by the contents of this letter, that the three men-of-war from Charleston, sent by South-Carolina to the relief of Georgia, actually made their appearance. They determined the conduct of the Spaniards. They produced the panic among their troops, which resulted in the abandonment of the invasion almost at the beginning. The relation of cause and effect, is as clearly established in this case as in any instance that was ever recorded in history. The Spaniards at once hurried to their ships, leaving their cannon and munitions behind them. Thus, says our historian, the vigilance of Oglethorpe, the skilfulness of his plans, the activity of his operations, the determined spirit of resistance, the carnage of Bloodymarsh, where the young Lieutenants laid the successful ambush, the havoc done to the enemy s ships, and his ingenious stratagem to defeat the designs of the French deserter, saved Georgia and Carolina from falling into the hands of the Spaniards. A little before (p. 183) Oglethorpe is spoken of as one who is, by the defence of Georgia, to protect the whole of the Americans from desolation. This, we submit, is the language of hyperbole, not proper to the historian. Carolina might be hurt by the Spaniards, her outposts assailed, her slaves spirited away, and the Indians kept in scouting bands upon her borders, by the malign influences of the Spaniards in Florida; but she had hitherto...
