A marked increase has also been noted in some cases of diabetes insipidus, in which 29 grammes of sodium chloride have been eliminated in the twenty-four hours. A similar increase may occur in prurigo, in which, in one instance, 29.6 grammes were passed in twenty-four hours. In cases of general paresis during the first stage an increased elimination goes hand in hand with an increased ingestion of food. In epilepsy the polyuria following the attacks is associated with an increase in the chlorides. Of drugs, certain diuretics, and some of the potassium salts, as has been mentioned, produce an increase: the chlorine contained in chloroform, whether administered internally or as an anaesthetic, is in part excreted in the form of a chloride. Salicylic acid, on the other hand, is said to cause a temporary diminution. It is of practical importance to note that in acute febrile affections the diminution in the chlorides appears to vary with the intensity of the disease, a decrease to 0.05 gramme pro die justifying the conclusion that the case under observation is of extreme gravity. It may at times also indicate the previous occurrence of severe diarrhoea or the formation of exudates of considerable extent. A continued increase, on the other hand, should lead to the conclusion that the patient's condition is improving. The elimination of the chlorides also furnishes a fair index to the digestive powers of the patient. This rule also holds good for...
